back pain: implications for treatment. Chronic low back pain (LBP) is a disabling condition that can have a serious impact on a patient's quality of life. Evidence suggests that oxidative stress may be involved in LBP, and the treatments used in its management may be influenced by a patient's antioxidant status. The objectives of this study were to determine whether LBP patients have differences in total antioxidant status and oxidant stress compared with healthy volunteers, and whether the association of antioxidant status with pain intensity is different in LBP patients and healthy volunteers. We performed a case-control study of 37 LBP patients and 37 healthy volunteers. Oxidative stress was assessed by measuring plasma levels of lipid hydroperoxides and plasma vitamin E, malondialdehyde, and glutathione. Total antioxidant status was determined by measuring serum concentrations of vitamin C, uric acid, and albumin. Statistical analyses were performed with the use of multiple linear regression and Pearson correlation coefficients
