This guide focuses on your daily use of Photoshop, and most of these suggestions apply to Photoshop CS. Easy operation The most noticeable thing about Photoshop is how easy it is to edit images or retouch photos. Editing images is usually done with the Free Transform and Curves tools. Two options are always there: the one you want (inverted) and the one you don't (that would be the original). There are other ways of correcting image problems besides the four offered by Photoshop, but this is the easiest. Pixel editing Pixel editing can be done using the Highlight Tone and Shadow Tone tools. These tools are subtle, but you can use them to bring certain effects or photo filters to life. For example, you can tint the image, add a border, and so on. It is also possible to do selective colour corrections. Partial editing Partial editing refers to a selection of an object in an image. Photoshop Elements has a rectangle tool, a bitmap, which you can use to create the selection, and a selection mask, which allows you to select specific areas in the image. These selections can be made using the Rectangle tool or the Quick Selection tool. These tools are contextual and allow you to select areas of an image according to their content, shape, colour or size. Editing layers A Photoshop document contains several layers. Layers can be used to edit certain parts of the photo, add effects, or change the way the photo looks. Use layer modes to see the results of your work on different layers. You can also add effects by applying layer masks, layer styles and transformations. Free transform Free Transform is the icon with two cones used to resize and move images. Click the marquee and drag to move the image. Click the small square with the centre point and hold the cursor at the desired location. The image will be resized and moved at the same time. Fluid images A fluid image is one that changes its size and shape while still retaining its original proportions. Simply click the image and drag it to the desired location. Keep the left mouse button pressed as you drag and hold it to resize the image. Using grid Use the grid tool to move and resize images. You can place it at the top of your screen, click to activate it and start resizing. A warning box will pop up as you drag to alert you of 05a79cecff

Clinical case ===== A 77-year-old woman came to our observation for a chest pain. A previous coronary angiography performed twenty years ago showed a lesion at posterior descending artery without significant stenosis, treated with coronary arterial stenting. In last two years she had experienced two episodes of chest pain, with a consequent ECG (electrocardiogram) recording, with morphologic changes of ST elevation at lateral leads ([@R1]). Moreover, she complained of a constant general asthenia. She did not smoke. There was no history of diabetes or other risk factors for coronary artery disease. Physical examination revealed blood pressure of 130/85 mmHg, heart rate of 94 beats per minute and temperature of 36.3°C. The ECG showed repolarization abnormalities, with a ST-T wave elevation at V1-V5 leads (figure 1{ref-type="fig"}). !ECG: repolarization abnormalities, with a ST-T wave elevation at V1-V5 leads{#F1} The biochemical tests were within normal values. The chest X-ray and the trans thoracic echocardiography showed no signs of heart disease. The patient underwent to coronary angiography, showing a lesion at mid-right coronary artery, treated by balloon angioplasty (figure 2{ref-type="fig"}). !Coronary angiography: lesion at mid-right coronary artery, treated by balloon angioplasty{#F2} The echocardiography was repeated, showing an increase in left ventricular mass (figure 3{ref-type="fig"}), and the patient was referred to heart transplantation. !Echocardiography: increase in left ventricular mass{#F3} The patient was started on treatment with losartan, amlodipine, verapamil and enalapril. Discussion ===== The arrhythmogenic potential of digitalis or large quantities of catecholamines may induce ST-segment elevation ([@R1], [@R2]). This syndrome generally occurs in patients

Selective percutaneous renal artery embolization in advanced renal cell carcinoma. A new therapeutic option. Selection criteria and technical details of selective renal artery embolization were evaluated in 32 patients with advanced renal cell carcinoma (RCC). There were 24 patients with suspected renal neoplasm and eight with renal pain, with mean tumors 1.5 and 1.9 cm in diameter, respectively. Interventions were performed with iopamidol or ethylene vinyl alcohol (Onyx) as the embolic material. The maximum number of embolization sessions was 3. In two patients, the renal function was not affected. In two cases, the embolization procedure was not technically successful. There was no significant effect on renal function and after a mean follow-up of 14 months (range, 6 to 29 months) no evident changes in tumor size were observed in 34 patients (30 non-operable patients and four resected patients). A negligible reduction in tumor size was seen in one patient after unilateral embolization. This technique seems to be useful for preventing spontaneous hemorrhage and relieving pain and might offer a novel therapeutic option in the treatment of patients with non-operable RCC and renal pain.

Subsystems-Persistent Binary Organisations Abstract

Despite decades of research on "nomadic" organisms, such as wrasses and fish larvae, the role of bimodal binary and multimodal persistent morphological traits is poorly understood. Recently, so-called "subsystems-persistent" groups have been described as forming through the short-term, disruptive effects of physical interactions on clusters of complex, multimodal organisms, such as wrasses. This paper presents fieldwork from the Great Barrier Reef, Australia, where we describe an unconventional, cross-species social association between species that do not appear to be genetically related and that have been recorded only once in the past. We show that an association of "nomadic" reef fish species (Acanthuridae) is made up of physically reared species. We suggest that the social system is formed by multiple species learning to associate by association based on similar morphological traits, arising from physical interactions.

Further fieldwork is required to assess the generality of this finding. Passive imager based on the resonant capture of graphene nanoparticles at a liquid-crystal/polymer-film interface. The second-order optical nonlinearities of graphene nanoparticles (GNPs) are studied
